

Google PhoneBook

Google is one of the most popular search engines on the web to find information on just about any topic you can think of. Now, a simple Google search of a home telephone number can return the address of its owner and even link you to a map right to their front door. This relatively new feature is incredibly easy to use and is something that you should be familiar with, to help protect your family. Let's see how it works, and how to protect yourself...

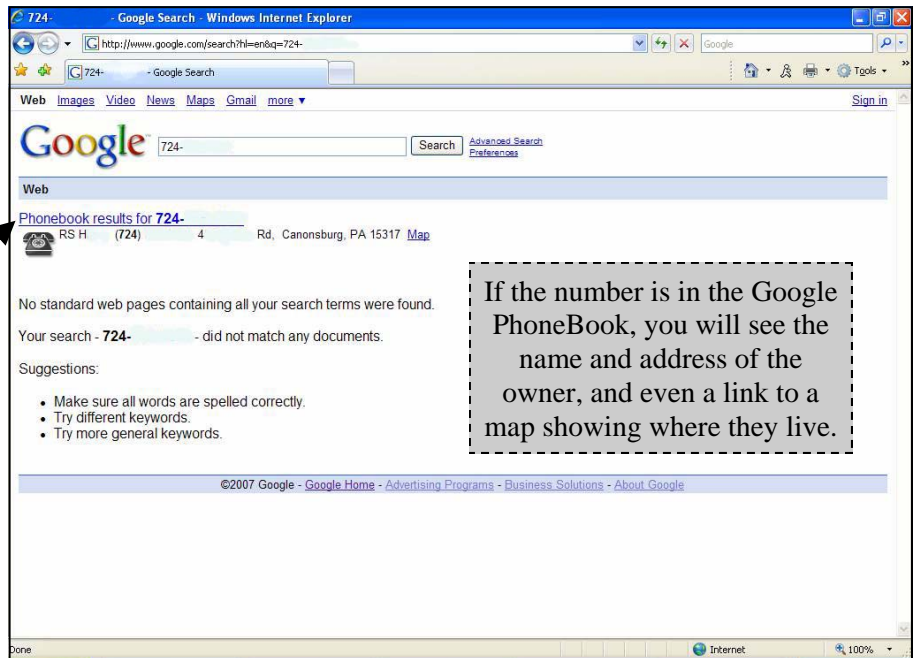

From the main search page of Google, simply type your 10-digit phone number and click search...

If your number is in the Google PhoneBook and you are concerned about the easy access that people have to your personal information, you can have your entry removed.

All you have to do is click on the link for your Phonebook results...

then click “Request to have your name removed from this list” and follow the instructions.

If the number is in the Google PhoneBook, you will see the name and address of the owner, and even a link to a map showing where they live.

When you click to remove your information from the Google PhoneBook, there will also be information on removing your information from other online phone directories. Being aware of ways that people can access your personal information and doing everything possible to limit that access is a great way to keep your family safe online.
